

BYE-BYE, BUSH BOOM

Check out Paul Krugman's latest column, lots of great nuggets in there. This is especially telling:

For the first time since 1932, employment is lower in the summer of a presidential election year than it was on the previous Inauguration Day.

Pay no attention to the man behind the curtain, the economy is doing GREAT! Just not for the average worker, if they can even find a job.

Another choice bit:

Bush campaign ads boast that 1.5 million jobs were added in the last 10 months, as if that were a remarkable achievement. It isn't. During the Clinton years, the economy added 236,000 jobs in an average month. Those 1.5 million jobs were barely enough to keep up with a growing working-age population.

Does the Bush administration really think we are stupid? Then why do they treat us like we are? Maybe when they have actually created 1 job that didn't already exist when Bush took office, then maybe they'll have something to gloat about. Of course, they'd take that as a sign that they need to ram through another tax cut heavily favoring the ones who need it least.

Continue reading "Bye-Bye, Bush Boom"